JAWABAN SOAL NOMOR 1

For Plato, genuine life is defined by the immortal soul and its inherent connection to the non-material realm of the eternal Forms. The physical body is merely a temporary vessel, and the soul's true purpose is to use reason to recall its innate knowledge of these perfect essences. Ultimately, the highest life is an intellectual and moral pursuit focused on philosophical truth and achieving the ultimate reality, the Form of the Good.

JAWABAN SOAL NOMOR 2

Aristotle defined life as the function of the psyche, which is the form or essential structure of a living body and the source of its characteristic activities. He established a hierarchy of life, ranging from the nutritive soul in plants to the sensitive soul in animals and the rational soul unique to humans. Therefore, being alive means performing the functions specific to one's kind and the best human life is achieved through the virtuous exercise of reason (eudaimonia).
